Pluralism In Harmony: Unity In Diversity

Pluralism In Harmony: Unity In Diversity

As the largest archipelagic country in the world with more than 17,000 islands, Indonesia has a unique social characteristic which influences the character of the prevailing law. In Indonesia, there are three prevailing and applicable laws in society. Long before Islam came to Indonesia, the Indonesian society has applied Adat law (customary law). Currently, in some local communities, Adat law is still applied in their social living to resolve disputes in the community, such as family and inheritance cases. The 1945 Constitution recognises the existence of the Adat law, and courts may apply this law when the parties are the subject to the Adat law.

Moslem as the largest population – more than 80% – has been shaping the pattern of the applicable law in Indonesia with Islamic law. The Islamic law is applied to Islamic civil and business cases, such as family law, inheritance law and Islamic finance cases (murabahah, mudharabah, musyarakah). The state also provides a special court for the Islamic cases, the Pengadilan Agama (Islamic Court) has jurisdiction to adjudicate cases in Islamic issues. Moreover, Indonesia also has a special province which applies Islamic law. For instance, Nangroe Aceh Darussalam has been given authority to apply Islamic Law not only in civil cases, but also in criminal cases.

Indonesia was the colony of the Netherlands East India administration; therefore, it inherits the civil law system. Indonesia recognizes legal codification both in substantive and procedural laws in its national law. In the first stage, the codification was designated to reduce legal pluralism in Indonesia. However, in reality, the legal pluralism in Indonesian remains exist. Legal pluralism becomes the unique identity for Indonesian legal system in which the three different regimes (Adat law, Islamic law and national law) can be harmonized in one Indonesian legal system.
